

EXPERIENCE, QUALITY AND A PERSONAL APPROACH

John Matthews provides his clients with a dream result and believes communication is the key to a success.

After more than 30 years in the industry, John Matthews from Constructive Building, offers each client the advice and wisdom he has earned after many years in the building industry.

He started his career as a carpentry and joinery apprentice in the Master Builders Association apprenticeship scheme and has a genuine passion for his job.

“My Dad was a builder back in the country so it really is in my blood – I love it,” Mr Matthews said.

He spoke about how products and materials used in modern times are much more different and that safety has become a much bigger issue, especially in the last 10 years.

“It’s becoming more and more important to the job especially when it comes to costs and procedures,” Mr Matthews said.

Over the years, he has found that clients have become more discerning and he is working across a broader spectrum of projects including renovations, extensions and new homes.

Into the future, Mr Matthews is eager to work with more clients on contract homes as he is driven by the idea of working with interior designers and architects on a shared vision.

John started Constructive Building in 2008 but prior to that, was a building supervisor for Rawson Homes, worked as a builder for PBS in Sydney and Canberra, building a mixture of commercial and residential properties. He also built the transitional release centre at the Alexander Maconochie Centre (Canberra Gaol).

He started Constructive Building because of a strong desire to be his own boss.

“I’d seen how bigger companies do things and I felt there was a niche in the market for somebody with a more personal approach to building. I really wanted to have the satisfaction of running my own business,” Mr Matthews said.

“I meet the clients at the start and am with them right through until the end.”

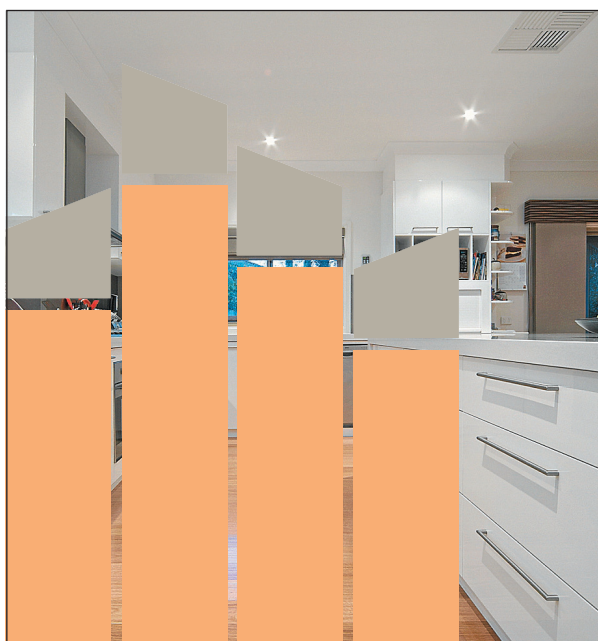

He said that ensuring control over all stages of the building process guaranteed that each job was done to perfection.

You will communicate directly with Mr Matthews throughout the project, with ongoing communication the key to a fabulous result.

He is proud of the attention to detail provided in each project, and of the friendly and respectful approach Constructive Building offers during one of the biggest and most exciting times in your life.
